In (in), prep. Forms: a. 1-in; also 3 Orm. inn, 5 yn, e, ynn. β. 2-6 i, i-, 3-4 y, 6- i'. [Common Teut. = OFris. OS. OLG., Goth. in, ON. í (Sw., Da. i), cognate with L. in, Gr. ἐν. In OE., in all those texts in which the word occurs, the full form in is used, but in early ME. the apocopated i became common in certain dialects.

In the Orunulum, inn (= in) is employed before vowels and h, and i before all consonants except h. Early southern texts, such as the Lamb. and Cott. Homilies, Juliana, St. Kath., St. Mark., Ancr. R., etc., show a similar tendency, but with more or less irregularity, the MSS. often differing in this respect; on the whole, i is preferred when the prep. precedes the definite article or the demonstrative pronouns, as i þe, i þis, i þat. In some of these texts (Ancr. R., Lamb. Hom.) the relations of the two forms are further complicated by the use of IN, which also appears (e.g. in Ayent, Owl & Night, Shoreham) where it is rare or altogether wanting. The prevalence of i in these southern texts suggests that Ormin's use of this form was not due to Scandinavian influence, especially as northern writers (including Scottish down to 1600) always employed in, though i is common in the modern dialects. In standard English from the time of Chaucer in has been the normal form; but former colloquial usage is sometimes retained in verse in the combination i' th, or as an archaism in i' faith.

General Sense.—The preposition expressing the relation of inclusion, situation, position, existence, or action, within limits of space, time, condition, circumstances, etc. In ancient times, expressing also (like L. in) motion or direction from a point outside to one within limits; the two senses being determined by the case of the word expressing the limits, the former taking the dative (originally locative), the latter the accusative or case of direction. These cases being subsequently levelled, this distinction ceased to be practicable, and the latter relation is now ordinarily expressed by the compound in-to, INTO; but there are various locutions in which (either because the accompanying verb conveys the sense of motion, or through the preservation of an ancient phrase without analysis) in still expresses motion from without to within.

In OE. (as in OS. and to some extent in OFris.) the prep. in was displaced by the prep. on (WGer. an, Goth. ana), so that in classical and late WSaxon, and to some extent in other OE. dialects, on was used for both on and in, an emphatic or distinctive sense of 'in' being however expressed by innan. (See full details in Dr. T. Miller, OE. Version of Bede, Introd. xxxiii-xxlv.) In Anglian, esp. in the north and west, in remained (though, under WSax. influence, often displaced by on in documents); and in ME. the distinction of in and on was gradually restored, though many traces of their former blending still remain. (See see 2.)

The formal coincidence of in with the L. prep. in (with which it is originally cognate) led to its being employed, in translating from L., in senses or uses which were idiomatic in L., but not originally English. These also have affected the current contextual use of the preposition.

I. Of position or location.

Primarily in (of position) is opposed to out of: anything which is in a given space is not out of it, and vice versa. The compound with-in, is mainly an equivalent of the emphasizing the relation to limits. The simple relations nearest in sense to in are at and on, with which in sometimes has common ground, e.g. 'in or at Oxford', 'in or on a street', 'in or on behalf of a man'. In may also have common ground with with, as 'to travel in or with a caravan, a railway train, etc.'

1. Of place or position in space or anything having material extension: Within the limits or bounds of, within (any place or thing).

May relate to a space of any size, however large or small: e.g. in the universe, in the world, in heaven, in hell, in the earth, in the sea (otherwise on the earth, on the sea, at sea), in a field, wood, forest, desert, wilderness (but on a heath, moor, or common), in (U.S. on) a street, in a house, carriage, box, drawer, nut-shell, drop of water, etc.

II. The Italian prep. = Latin in, as in the phrases in fresco, in petto, for which see the sbs.

In, obs. f. INN; var. HIN pron. Obs., him.

In-, pref. 1, the prep. and adv. In, in combination with verbs, verbal derivatives, and other words. In original compound verbs, unaccented in- passed in WS. into on- (cf. IN pref., General Sense): e.g. Goth. inlihtjan, OHG. inlihten, OE. onlihtan to enlighten, illuminate; Goth. intandjan, OE. ontendan to set on fire, Goth. inwandjan, OE. onwenden to turn, change. In such of these verbs as survived in ME., on- was normally reduced to a-. But, in late OE., numerous new verbs in in- appeared as glosses or literal renderings of Latin verbs in in-, e.g. inblawan = L. inflare, inspire to blow in, inbringan = L. inferre to bring in, inlidan = L. introducere to lead in. The formation of these in similar circumstances continued in ME. to the close of the 14th c., when numerous examples occur in Wyclif. Among the ME. examples are inclefe, L. invocare to call in, indelve, L. infodere to dig in, insette, L. insundere to pour in, inloze, L. inflammare to inflame, inwappen, L. involvere to enwrap, inwrite, L. inscribere to inscribe. Few or none of these verbs have survived into mod. English. In OE. the adv. inn, in, was also freely used in collocation with verbs of motion or change of state. The position of the adv. was with the finite tenses, variable; in the infinitive it generally stood before the vb., and in derived verbal sbs. and adjs. always so. In this position the adv. came at length to be written in combination with the vb., e.g. income-n, incoming, income sb., indwelle-n, indwelling, indweller, etc. In the infinitive and other verbal forms in- remained movable, and is now regularly placed after the verb, as in come in, go in, call in, lead in, etc.; but the derived sbs. and adjs. in which the position of in- was invariable, have become regular compounds with stress on in-, thus incoming, income, incomer (beside come in), indwelling, indweller (beside dwell in), inlet, insight, intake, etc. See IN adv. 11. (Cf. the parallel case of German verbs with movable prefixes, as eingehen, eingehen, eingegangen, gehe ein, er geht ein, wenn er eingeht, eingang, eingehend; geben, engeben; etc.) There are also various other formations, OE., ME., or modern, in which this prefix occurs, usually with the sense 'in, within, internal', e.g. OE. ingehygd, ingepanc internal thought, intent, inland demesne land, ME. inwit conscience; mod. inborn, inside, inward, etc. In a few instances prepositional phrases with in- have given rise to attributive combinations, as in-college residents, in-door occupations.

As to the blending of this prefix and In- pref. 2 in later use, see at the end of the latter.

In-, pref. 2, repr. L. in- adv. and prep., used in combination with verbs or their derivatives, less commonly with other parts of speech, with the senses 'into, in, within; on, upon; towards, against', sometimes expressing onward motion or continuance, sometimes intensive, sometimes transitive, and in other cases with little appreciable force.

Form-history. In earlier L., in- was generally retained unchanged before all consonants; but in later times it was assimilated to the following consonant, becoming il- before l, im- before a labial, ir- before r. These changes are retained in Eng.: e.g. il-late, im-bue, im-mit, im-pel, ir-radiate: see IL-1, IM-1, IR-1. In OF., in inherited words, in-, im-, became en-, em-; but learned words derived or formed from L., esp. in later times, regularly retained in-, im-. The French words were adopted in Eng. in their current form; but from the 14th c.

onward, there was a growing tendency in words in which the L. derivation was evident, to change en-, em- back to L. in-, im-, as in the words of learned origin. This was even extended to some words which were not obviously, or not at all of L. origin, including some of those in which en-, em- was, as a living formative, prefixed to radicals of OE. or other origin. (See EN-) Conversely, some words directly from L. were formed with the French en-, em-. Hence, a large number of words occur in the 15th and 16th c. with both forms of the prefix, and some have retained both forms to the present day, either with no distinction of sense, as in enclose, inclose, enquire, inquire, or with differentiation of use, as ensure, insure. The general tendency (though with numerous exceptions) has been to establish in-, im-, in words evidently derived from L., reserving en-, em-, for words formed in French and not having a L. type, or in which the L. type is disguised by phonetic change, and for words formed in Eng. on the analogy of these. In this Dictionary, current words are placed under their usual form, whether in- (im-) or en- (em-), or, in unsettled cases, in that which, on grounds of etymology or analogy, appears to be the preferable form; obsolete words have been dealt with on the same principles, and cross-references have been given to the form under which each word is treated.

Since *in-*¹ and *in-*² are identical in form, and to a great extent in sense, they come in later use to be felt as one and the same prefix; and it is this resulting prefix which appears in many words of later formation, formed upon native substantives or adjectives, in which in-, im-, has affinities at once with the prefix en-, em-, from French, and with OE. in-.

In-, *pref.*³, the Lat. in-, cognate with Gr. a-, av-, Com. Teut. un-, prefixed to adjs. and their derivatives, rarely to other words, to express negation or privation; as felix happy, infelix unhappy, utilis useful, inutilis useless, nocens hurtful, innocens unhurtful, innocent, doctus learned, indoctus unlearned. In earlier Latin, in- was used before all consonants, but in later times was subjected to the same assimilations as *in-*², as in il-litteratus illiterate, im-mensus unmeasured, im-mense, ir-regularis without rule, irregular, and was besides reduced to i- before gn, as in i-gnarus ignorant; i-gnoscere not to take cognizance of, to overlook, forgive. In a few OF. words, in- became en- as in *in-*², e.g. inimicus, OF. enemi enemy, invidia, OF. envie envy; but most French words containing this prefix are of learned formation, and retain L. in- (il-, im-, ir-); as is the case also in Eng. with words derived either through French, or from L. direct. In Eng. in- (il-, im-, ir-) is a living negative suffix for words of Latin or Romanic origin, freely used, even when no corresponding formation appears in Latin; in this use it interchanges to some extent with the OE. negative un-, which is used in native or thoroughly naturalized words, e.g. incautious, un-cautious, in-ceremonious, in-certain, in-, un-communicative, in-, un-devout, in-, un-distinguishable. In such cases the practice in the 16th and 17th c. was to prefer the form with in-, e.g. inadvisable, inarguable, inavailable, but the modern tendency is to restrict in- to words obviously answering to Latin types, and to prefer un- in other cases, as in unavailing, uncertain, undevout.

In-, *pref.*⁴, of Teut. origin, prefixed to OE. and ME. adjs., with intensive force. In origin akin to in- *pref.*¹, with the sense 'inly', 'intimately', 'thoroughly', and hence 'exceedingly', 'very'. Examples: OE. indryhten most noble, infród very wise, inhold thoroughly loyal; ME. inred deep red. (On this prefix in the cognate langs., see Hoefer 'Das intensive IN', in Germania, new ser. III. 61.)

-in, *suffix*¹, Chem. A modification of the chemical suffix *-ine*⁵, introduced into systematic nomenclature by Hofmann a 1860, used systematically in Watts' Dict. Chem. in 1866, and subsequently adopted by the Chemical Society, for the names of neutral substances, such as glycerides, glucosides, bitter principles, colouring matters, and proteids, which are thus distinguished from names of alkaloids and basic substances in -ine. Examples, albumin, casein, fibrin, globulin, mucin, myosin, pepsin; cerebrin, chitin, chondrin, gelatin, lecithin; aceticin, alizarin, aloin, arbutin, cerotin, curcumin, dextrin, hematin, indigotin, inulin, isatin, palmitin, purpurin, salicin, ulmin, vanillin. Some of these were formerly spelt with -ine, and in that spelling had passed into popular use before the rectification of the nomenclature, esp. dextrine, gelatine, margarine, which are still commonly so spelt in non-scientific use.

1881 Chemical Society, Instructions to Abstractors p. 16 Basic substances should invariably be indicated by names ending in -ine, as aniline, instead of anilin, the termination -in being restricted to certain neutral compounds, viz. glycerides, glucosides, bitter principles, and proteids, such as palmitin, mygdalin, albumin.

-in, *suffix*², an obs. variant of *-ine*¹ in adjs., as feminin, genuin, etc.; also an occasional variant of *-ine*⁴: -ina, as in ruin.

-ina, *suffix*¹, a Latin feminine suffix found in reg-ina queen, extended in It. or Sp., and thence in Eng. use, to form feminine titles, as czar-ina (for Russ. tsaritsa), and female Christian names, as Alexandr-ina, Angel-ina, Christ-ina, Clement-ina, Georg-ina, Thomas-ina, Wilhelm-ina, etc. (Cf. *-ine*⁴.) It occurs also as a formative of some other words, as in concertina, seraphina, etc., names of musical instruments.

-ina, *suffix*², in words which are the neuter pl. of L. adjs. in -inus, and in mod.L. words formed after them, used (in agreement with animālia animals, understood) to form names of groups of animals related to some typical genus, as Bombycina (genus Bombyx), etc.

1598 FLORIO, Incordatura,... the incording or bursting of a horse. 1607 TOPSELL Four-f. Beasts (1658) 307 This term, Incording, is borrowed of the Italian word Incordato, which in plain English is as much to say as Bursten. The Italians, as I take it, did call it Incordato, because the gut follows the string of the stone, called of them Il cordone, or La corda, whereof Incordato seems to be derived with some reason. According to which reason we should call it rather Instringed, then Incorded; for Cordado doth signifie a string or cord. Notwithstanding, sith that Incording is already received in the stable, I for my part am very well content therewith, minding not to contend against it. 1610 MARKHAM Masterp. II. xlix. 292 This incording or burstiness in horses, is when the rim or thinnie filme which holdeth the guts vp in a horses body is broken, so that the guts fallth downe either into the cods of the horse, or into the horses flanke. 1725 BRADLEY *Fam. 2. A deed between two or more parties with mutual covenants, executed in two or more copies, all having their tops or edges correspondingly indented or serrated for identification and security. Hence, A deed or sealed agreement or contract between two or more parties, without special reference to its form.

Originally both copies were written on one piece of parchment or paper, and then cut asunder in a serrated or sinuous line, so that when brought together again at any time, the two edges exactly tallied and showed that they were parts of one and the same original document: hence the expression 'pair of indentures'. Occasionally a word, sentence, or figure was engrossed on the space where they were divided, as in the space between a bank cheque and its counterfoil.

6. spec. (short for Index librorum prohibitorum). The list, published by authority, of books which Roman Catholics are forbidden to read, or may read only in expurgated editions.

Rules for the formation of such an Index (Regule Indicis) were formulated by the Council of Trent, in accordance with which an Index librorum prohibitorum (Index of prohibited books) was published by authority of Pius IV in 1564, and, with an Appendix, by Clement VIII in 1596; new editions, augmented with the names of later authors and books, have been published from time to time down to the present. This is the official 'Index'. In its current form, it is a list, not only of works entirely prohibited to the faithful, but also of works not to be read, unless or until they are corrected (visi or donec corrigantur); in the case of the latter, the portions to be deleted or altered are sometimes indicated. (In first quot., short for Index expurgatorius: see b.)

The Regule of the Council of Trent provided for the expurgation of such books, and in accordance therewith an Index Expurgatorius was printed at Antwerp, under the authority of Philip II, in 1571 (reprints of which are referred to in quot. 1611), another under the authority of the Inquisitor General Quiroga at Madrid in 1584 (see quot. 1625), and others with the same or similar titles in various Roman Catholic states. A bull of Sixtus V (1585-90) also authorized the Cardinals chosen to deal with prohibited books to prepare 'indices expurgatorii'. Such a work on a large scale was commenced at Rome 1607 (Bergamo 1608), with the title 'Indices librorum expurgandorum in studiosorum gratiam confecti Tomus I., in quo 50 auctorum libri præ cæteris desiderant emendationem, per F. Jo. Mariam Brusichell, Sacri Palatii Apostol. Magistrum'. This (which never proceeded beyond the first volume) is the work referred to in quot. 1620. (See, on the whole subject, Rev. J. Mendham Account of the Indexes, both prohibitory and expurgatory, 1826, Literary Policy of the Church of Rome, 1830 and 1844.) In English use, the name Index Expurgatorius has often been applied to the Index librorum prohibitorum (cf. quot. 1845), especially in transf. and fig. uses.

1611 CORVAT Cruelities 521 The Index expurgatorius printed at Geneva and Strasbourg. 1620 BRENT Tr. Sarpi's Conc. Trent (1676) 875 In the year 1607, they printed in Rome with public authority, a Book intitled Index Expurgatorius. 1625 USSHER Ans. to Jesuit 513 Their old Expurgatory Index... set out by Cardinal Quiroga. 1691 T. Indian summer. [INDIAN a. 2.]

A period of calm, dry, mild weather, with hazy atmosphere, occurring in the late autumn in the Northern United States.

(The name is generally attributed to the fact that the region in which the meteorological conditions in question were originally noticed was still occupied by the Indians; but other more specific explanations have been essayed. In its origin it appears to have had nothing to do with the glowing autumnal tints of the foliage, with which it is sometimes associated. The actual time of its occurrence and the character of the weather appear also to vary for different regions: see the quotes.)

Indict (indæ't), v. 1. Forms: a. 4-6 endyte, 4-7 endite, 6 endight (endict). b. 4-9 indite, 5 indyte, 6 indycht, 6-7 indight. γ. 7- indict. [ME. endite-n, a. AF. endite-r to indict, charge, accuse, corresponds in form to OF. enditer, -diter, -ditter, answering to a late L. type indicāre*, f. in- (IN-2) + dicāre to say, declare, DICTARE. But the OF. verb is recorded only in the senses 'make known, indicate, dictate, suggest, compose, write, instruct, inform, prompt, incite' (Godef.), so that the history of the AF. and ME. word is not clear. A corresponding med. L. indicāre to indict, accuse, is cited by Du Cange only in English legal use, and seems to be merely the latinized form of the AF. and ME. verb, in accordance with which again the ME. endite has been altered to indite, and (since 1600) written indict, though the spoken word remains indite. See also INDITE v.]

The sense of endite, indict, may have arisen from L. indicere 'to declare publicly', taken as in It. indicare 'to denounce' (Florio); but it comes near to a sense of L. indicāre to INDICATE, 'to give evidence against'; and it appears as if there had been, in late L. or Romanic, some confusion of the L. verbs indicāre, inducere, indicāre: thus in It., Florio has 'Indicare, to shew, to declare, to utter; also, to endorse and accuse, as Indicare'; 'Inducere, to intimate, denounce, manifest, declare;... also to accuse, to approach or detect'; 'Indittare, to indite; also as Indicare'; 'Indittore, an inditer, a denouncer; also an intimator.') which conform it to the point of view of the reporter; oblique: opposed to DIRECT a. 6 b.

The idioms of different languages differ widely in respect to indirect construction. In English, indirect sentences are usually introduced by that or if, expressed or understood. Thus, a speaker's actual words 'I will not go unless you use force', are reported indirectly, by the person addressed, as 'he said [that] he would not go unless I used force', by a third party as 'he told X. [that] he would not go, unless he (X.) used force'. The question 'Do you know me?' becomes, in indirect narration, 'He asked me if I knew him', and 'he asked X. if he knew him'.

1866 MASON Eng. Gram. (ed. 7) 111 In such sentences... the dependent clauses are indirect questions. 1866 W. E. JELF Grk. Gram. (ed. 4) § 886 II. 627 Indirect interrog. sentences. 1870-7 MOULTON tr. Winer's N. T. Gram. iii. § 60. 9 When words spoken by others are quoted, they are not, as a rule, brought into the structure of the sentence in the indirect construction. 1879 ROBY Lat. Gram. II. 342 When a statement, question [etc.] is reported in a form which makes it dependent in construction on some such words as said, the language is said to be oblique or indirect.

c. Indirect object (see quots.).

1879 ROBY Lat. Gram. II. 54 The indirect object is the person (or thing) affected by the occurrence of an action... although not directly or primarily acted on. 1881 MASON Eng. Gram. (ed. 24) 149 The Indirect Object of a verb denotes that which is indirectly affected by an action, but is not the immediate object or product of it, as 'Give him the book'; 'Make me a coat'.

d. Indirect passive, a passive verb having for its subject the indirect object of the active voice, as I was told it; he was refused admittance; the mayor is given power and authority (see GIVE v. 2); also, a passive voice formed on an intransitive verb construed with a preposition, the prepositional object becoming the subject of the passive verb, while the preposition becomes adverbial, as they have spoken to him, he has been spoken to; many run after her, she is much run after.

A. adj. Common to India and Europe; applied to the great family or class of cognate languages (also called INDO-GERMANIC and ARYAN, q.v.) spoken over the greater part of Europe and extending into Asia as far as northern India, and to the race or its divisions characterized by the use of one or other of these languages.

The earliest name for this family of languages, and, both from priority of date and superior fitness of expression, having greater claims than INDO-GERMANIC.

1814 [Da. T. Young] in Q. Rev. X. 255 (Adelung's Mittheilungen) Another ancient and extensive class of languages, united by a greater number of resemblances than can well be altogether accidental, may be denominated the Indo-European, comprehending the Indian, the West Asiatic, and almost all the European languages. Ibid. 256 Classes and Families. II. Indo-European: Sanscrit, Median, Arabian, Greek, German, Celtic, Latin, Cantabrian, Slavonic. 1815 [Dr. T. D. Whitaker] Ibid. XIV. 97 (Hermes Scythicus) Of the five classes which we denominated Monosyllabic, Indo-European, Tataric, African, and American, the first two only are to be considered as constituted according to correct philological principles. 1826 PRICHARD Phys. Hist. Mankind v. i. 491 By some the term of Indo-European, by others that of Indo-German dialects, has been applied to the whole class of idioms which are found to be thus allied. The former of these terms is preferable to the latter, and indeed to any other, as being the most general. 1831 — Eastern Origin Celtic Nat. 20 Adelung and Murray have regarded the Celtic as a branch of the Indo-European stock. 1841 LATHAM Eng. Lang. i. 3 That the Celtic languages were Indo-European has lately been demonstrated by Dr. Prichard. 1871 MORRIS Hist. Outl. Eng. Accid. (1873) 6 The Indo-European family comprehends nearly all the languages of Europe, and all those Indian dialects which have sprung from the old Hindu language (Sanskrit). 1877 PAPHILLON Man. Compar. Philol. (ed. 2) 12 The original home of the Indo-European or Aryan nations. Ibid. The position of an Indo-European people. 1884 RHYES Celtic Britain i. The great group of nations which has been variously called Aryan, Indo-European, Indo-Germanic, Indo-Celtic, and Japetic.

b. Pertaining or belonging to the Indo-European family of languages or peoples, as Indo-European root, philology, culture, etc.

B. sb. 1. A member of the Indo-European race; an Aryan.

1871 MORRIS Hist. Outl. Eng. Accid. 10 The language of the primitive Indo-Europeans had its local varieties or dialects.

2. An Indianized form. rare.

Indogæan (indodž'æn, -g'æn), a. [f. mod. L. Indogæa, f. INDO-1 + Gr. gæia the earth + -AN.] Of or pertaining to Indogæa, the zoological region (also called Indian) comprising India, China, the Eastern Peninsula, and the Indo-malayan archipelago, as far as Wallace's line.

Indogen (indodž'en). Chem. [f. INDO-2 + -GEN 1.] A name for the group $C_6H_4 \begin{smallmatrix} CO \\ NH \end{smallmatrix} C=$ the double molecule of which (di-indogen) constitutes indigo-blue. Hence Indogenic a. in I. acid = Indoxylic acid. Indogenide, a compound of indogen with another radical, as indogenide of benzoic aldehyde, or of pyruvic acid. Indigo-blue is the indogenide of pseudo-isatin, or di-indogen. 1886 SYD. Soc. Lex., Indogen. 1892 MORLEY & MUIR *Dict. Indo-Germanic, a. [f. INDO-1 + GERMANIC, ad. Ger. indogermanisch.] = INDO-EUROPEAN a., ARYAN a.

'Indo-Germanic' is a term of later introduction than 'Indo-European', and of German origin, appearing first, so far as yet traced (see Gustav Meyer in Indog. Forschungen II. 125-130), in Klaproth Asia Polyglotta, 1823. With Klaproth it seems to have been a kind of abbreviation of the expression used by him in an earlier work 'die grosse Indisch-Medisch-Slavisch-Germanische Völkerkette, die vom Ganges bis zu den Britannischen Inseln reicht', naming the two extreme members of the ethnological 'chain'. When Celtic was shown to be a still more extreme member of the same series, 'indogermanisch' lost its appropriateness, and some scholars tried to substitute indokeltisch, 'Indo-Celtic', in Fr. indo-celtique, while others, as Bopp in his Vergleichende Grammatik, gave preference to the more comprehensive indoeuropäisch, the equivalents to which, INDO-EUROPEAN, indo-européen, were also favoured in Great Britain and France. But the employment of 'indogermanisch' on the title-page of Pott's Etymologische Forschungen auf dem Gebiete der indogermanischen Sprachen (1833-36) popularized this term in Germany, whence under the influence of German textbooks, or of teachers trained in Germany, it has come into English use, and is now probably more used than 'Indo-European'.

1835 [Dr. ROSEN] in Q. Frñt. Educ. Apr. 332 (Review of Pott). The family of the Indo-Germanic languages may, according to Mr. Pott, be divided into five branches. 1839 Penny Cycl. XIII. 308/2 The following table taken from Pott's Etymologische Forschungen contains a list of the principal transformations of letters in some of the Indo-

Germanic languages. 1848 LATHAM Eng. Lang. (ed. 2) iv. § 31 Until the Celtic was shown by Dr. Prichard to have the same affinities with the Latin, Greek, . . . Sanskrit, and Zend, as those tongues had with each other, the class in question was called Indo-Germanic; since, up to that time, the Germanic languages had formed its western limit. 1866 Coruh. Mag. Nov. 631 The highest forms of Indo-Germanic culture. 1877 PAPHILLON Man. Compar. Philol. (ed. 2) 10 The name Indo-Germanic, employed by many German scholars, is hardly comprehensive enough of the European branch of the family.

Hence Indo-Germanist, a student of Indo-Germanic philology.

Indorse, v., another form of ENDORSE v., q.v. Etymologically, indorse is the fully latinized type (conformed to med.L. indorsāre), while endorse is a partially latinized form of the earlier ME. endoss, OF. endosser.

Indorse is the form found in legal and statutory use, and in most political economists; it is also that approved in all American dictionaries; in English use, according to Bithell (Counting-house Dictionary, ed. 1893), 'as to the forms Indorse and Endorse, practice appears to be entirely controlled by the taste of the writer'; but Endorse is said by business men to be now almost universal in English commercial use. So with the derivatives except Indorsation (which is now almost exclusively in Scotch use).

1547-1822 [see ENDORSE v. 1 B]. 1849 GILBERT Banking (ed. 5) 20 All legal writers write indorse. 1866 CRUMP Banking 122 On indorsing a bill or note to another person, care should be taken to spell the indorsee's name correctly. 1891 Law Times XC. 409/1 The writ was indorsed with a claim for the removal of two of the trustees. 1893 Law Times Ref. 9. The action of bringing on, bringing into existence or operation, producing, causing. Chiefly Med.

10. Electr. and Magnetism. The action of inducing or bringing about an electric or magnetic state in a body by the proximity (without actual contact) of an electrified or magnetized body.

The terms induce and induction were originally employed apparently to avoid the use of terms involving any theory of the nature of the action involved. The medium of communication is now held to be, as in the case of other forms of energy, the intervening ether.

Electrodynamic or voltaic induction, the production of an electric current (induced current) by the influence of another independent electric current. Electromagnetic induction, the production of a state of magnetic polarity in a body near or round which an electric or galvanic current passes, or the generation of an electric current by the action of a magnet (the latter called by Faraday, more properly, magneto-electric induction). Electrostatic induction, the production of an electrical charge upon a body by the influence of a neighbouring body charged with statical electricity, as exemplified in Volta's electrophorus. Magnetic induction, the production of magnetic properties in iron or other substances when placed in a magnetic field, as when a bar of soft iron is magnetized by a neighbouring magnet. Mutual induction, the reaction of two electric circuits upon each other; self-induction, the reaction of different parts of the same circuit upon one another.

1812 SIR H. DAVY Chem. Philos. 132 To produce a succession of effects both conductors must be brought near bodies connected with the ground, which gain the opposite state, in consequence of what may be called induction. 1830 HERSCHTEL Stud. Nat. Phil. 329 The communication of magnetism from the earth to a magnetic body, or from one magnetic body to another, is performed by a process to which the name of induction has been given. 1832 FARADAY Exp. Researches § 1 in Phil. Trans. 125 The power which electricity of tension possesses of causing an opposite electrical state in its vicinity has been expressed by the general term Induction; which, as it has been received into scientific language, may also with propriety be used in the same general sense to express the power which electric currents may possess of inducing any particular state upon matter in their immediate neighbourhood. Ibid. § 58. 139, I propose to call the agency thus exerted by ordinary magnets, magneto-electric or magnelectric induction. § 59 The only difference which powerfully strikes the attention as existing between voltaic and magneto-electric induction, is the suddenness of the former, and the sensible time required by the latter. 1870 TYNDALL Lect. Electr. 14 This forcible separation of the two fluids of a neutral conductor, by the mere proximity of an electrified body, is called electric induction. Bodies in this state are also said to be electrified by influence. 1892 S. P. THOMPSON Dynamo-Elect. Mach. (ed. 4) 83 We know that every electric current possesses a property sometimes called 'electric inertia', sometimes called 'self-induction', by virtue of which it tends to go on, and that it is in the current's own magnetic field that this inertia of self-induction resides. Ibid. 102 Mutual induction between adjacent parts is of enormous importance in alternate current machines.

11. Grammar. (See quot.)

1860 HALDEMAN Anal. Orthogr. ix. 52 Induction is the influence of larger classes of words on smaller ones, causing uniformity and regularity in Grammatical inflections.

12. Chem. (See quot.)

1892 MORLEY & MUIR Dict. Chem. III. 8/1 When H and Cl are mixed in equal volumes and exposed to sunlight, a measurable time elapses before chemical change begins. Bunsen and Roscoe, who examined this phenomenon, regard the mixture as resisting chemical change, and they used the term induction to express the gradual overcoming of this resistance. The term has also been used by Wright, who noticed a similar phenomenon in the reduction of metallic oxides by CO and H.

13. attrib. and Comb., as (sense 10) induction apparatus, current, machine, shock, spark; also induction-balance, an electrical apparatus so contrived that the currents induced in the secondary wires of two induction-coils balance each other; induction-bridge, a form of induction-balance arranged on the principle of a Wheatstone's bridge; induction-coil, an apparatus for producing electric currents by induction, consisting of two separated coils of wire generally surrounding a soft-iron core, the primary coil being connected with an external source of electricity, and having an arrangement for causing the electric current to vary in intensity, the effect of which is to produce a current of different character in the other or secondary coil; (sense 3) induction-pipe, the pipe through which the live steam is introduced into the cylinder of a steam-engine; induction-port, the opening by which steam passes from the steam-chest into the cylinder; induction-valve, the valve which controls the passage of steam into the cylinder.

1855-7 H. M. NOAD Man. Electr. II. 728 The *induction apparatus as at present constructed by M. Ruhmkorff is shown in Fig. 395. 1870 D. E. HUGHES in Proc. R. Soc. XXIX. 56 M. Dove, constructed an 'induction balance', wherein two separate induction coils, each having its primary and secondary coils, were joined together in such a manner that the induced current in one coil was made to neutralize the induced current in the opposite coil, thus forming an induction-balance, to which he gave the name of differential induction. Ibid. I have obtained a perfect induction balance which...allows us to obtain direct comparative measures of the force or disturbance produced by the introduction of any metal or conductor. 1889 FLEMING Alternate Current Transformer 247 Lord Rayleigh found it more convenient...to slightly alter the arrangement of the induction balance...B and I are a battery and interrupter, T is a telephone in the 'bridge'. 1855-7 NOAD *Man. -ine, suffix 1, forming adjs., repr. L. -inus, -ina, -inum, added to names of persons, animals, or material things, and to some other words, with the sense 'of' or 'pertaining to', 'of the nature of', represented in Fr. by -in masc., -ine fem., in Eng. now usually by -ine, formerly and still exceptionally by -in. Examples are L. adulterinus adulterine, anserinus anserine, asininus asinine, caninus canine, divinus divine, femininus feminine, gonatus genuine, libertinus libertine, marinus marine, masculus masculine, supinus supine; in some cases with blending of a previous suffix, as clandestinus clandestine, intestinus intestine, matulinus matutine, vespertinus vespertine. Also from proper names, as Alpinus Alpine, Capitolinus Capitoline, Latinus Latin (formerly Latine), Saturninus Saturnine, Tarentinus Tarentine. On the pattern of these, adjs. have continued to be freely formed in the Romanic langs. and in English, as in Algerine, Caroline, Florentine, Socotrine; and the termination is now greatly used in Natural History, in forming adjs., with or without L. type, on the names of genera, as acarine, acipitrine, bovine, caprine, equine, feline, hystricine, murine, passerine. In these Natural History adjs. the pronunciation is (-in), usually unstressed; but in other words it is very various, depending upon the length of time the word has been in English, the channel through which it came, the place of the stress, and other circumstances: cf. divine, supine (-a-in), marine (-r-in), feminine, genuine (-in), aviline, bovine, leonine, alkaline (-a-in), and see the history of the individual words.

-ine, suffix 2, forming adjs., repr. L. -inus, a. Gr. -ivos, from names of minerals, plants, etc., or (in a few words) of L. origin, having in Romanic and Eng., the same sense and the same forms, as -INE 1; as adamantin-us adamantine, amethystinus amethystine, corallinus coralline, crystallinus crystalline, hyacinthinus hyacinthine, pristinus pristine. The etymological and historical pronunciation is (-in), e.g. (pri'stin), (adä'mæntin); but, from the spelling -ine, and the attraction of words in -INE 1, there is now a strong tendency to lengthen the i in crystalline (-a-in), etc.

-ine, suffix 3, forming sbs., repr. F. -ine, L. -ina, Gr. -ivn, forming feminine titles, as in Gr. ἡρώιν, L. hērōina, F. héroïne heroine. With this the Ger. landgräfin, markgräfin, Du. landgravin, mark-gravin (the suffix of which is orig. the same as -EN 2 1), have fallen together in French and in Eng., as landgravine, margravine.

-ine, suffix ⁴, forming sbs., repr. F. -ine (-in), L. -ina (-inus), in origin identical with -INE. In L., -ina formed feminine abstracts from verbs, as rapina rapine, ruina ruin, and from agent-nouns, as disciplina discipline, doctrina doctrine, medicina medicine; also sbs. from other sources, as fascina fascine, resina resin, urina urine. The adjs. in -inus, -ina were also used subst., as in concubinus, -ina concubine, lupinus lupine, and esp. in proper names, as Antoninus Antonine, Augustinus Augustine, Constantinus Constantine, Crispinus Crispin, Justinus Justin, Agrippina, Constantina, etc. The English form of those in -ina (through Fr., or on the Fr. type) is -ine, occasionally in early words reduced to -in; those in -inus give F. and Eng. -in, but in Eng. often -ine.

Formations of this type were multiplied in late L. and Romanic, e.g. famina famine, F. routine; in Romanic this suffix (It., Sp. -ino, -ina, F. -in, -ine) is greatly used in forming names of derived substances, simulative appellations, diminutives, etc. Many of these have come into English, in the F. form -ine (-in), which has consequently become a formative element, freely used in forming the names of derivative products, and of things supposed to be derived from, resemble, imitate, or commemorate those from which they are named, and thus in the trade-names of new varieties of fabrics, cosmetics, patent medicines, and proprietary articles generally, e.g. dentine, ossein, nectarine, brillantine, grenaline, albertine, victorine, etc. Feminine personal names of Romanic origin in -ina sometimes retain that form, but often take -ine (-in or -in) after Fr., as Caroline, Catherine, Ernestine, Joséphine.

-ine, suffix ⁵, Chem., in origin an offshoot of -INE⁴, as occurring in the names of some derived substances: see GELATIN, -INE. At first used unsystematically in forming names of extractive principles and chemical derivatives of various kinds; also, in the English names given early in the 19th century to the four elements chlorine, fluorine, iodine, bromine (in F. chlore, fluor, iode, brome). In all these, but especially in the names of extractive principles, the ending -ine was by some reduced to -in, thus gelatine or gelatin, aconitine or aconitin, chlorine or chlorin. In recent systematic nomenclature the two forms have been differentiated, -ine being now used (1) in forming names of alkaloids and basic substances, as aconitine, cocaine, nicotine, strychnine, etc., which are thus distinguished from names of neutral substances, proteins, etc., in -in (see -IN¹); and (2) in Hofmann's systematic names of hydrocarbons of the form C_nH_m , as ethine or acetylene, C_2H_2 , propine or allylene, C_3H_4 , etc. These latter are not much used. In the names of the elements, and some other substances, not belonging to any of the classes named, -ine is retained (though chlorin, fluorin, etc., appear in some American books). In popular and commercial use, the ending -ine is still current in the names of some substances for which systematic nomenclature requires -in: see -IN¹.

-ine has been used by some authors to form the names of minerals; but in later systematic use, esp. by Dana, this is changed, in names of species, into -ite; thus chalcosine, erythrine, in Dana chalcocite, erythrite.
